The façade of the building is beige, textured limestone, an homage to the original building's industrial pass. The center core stairways are a dramatic focal point, lined with baguettes to create privacy and graphic flair.

The buildings were developed in two phases. For the first several years, the firm worked on the apartments in the main buildings. On the heels of that project, the second phase began: developing the mews garden and the adjacent townhouses and maisonettes. Originally, the building had five townhouses and eight maisonettes, and Workshop APD was tasked with converting it into two townhouses and three maisonettes. "The challenge was, how do you create something that is a luxury townhouse, but isn't traditional? What we did was transform the homes into vertical loft living."

the indoor and outdoor spaces. The second floor has three bedrooms, and the third floor is the master suite where a light-filled office creates a transition from the public into the private space. The penthouse floor is designed as a lounge and entertaining area, and it opens to a lushly planted terrace. The basement is set up as a media room, with large screen televisions and a modular sofa designed by the firm.

Says Kotchen, "This project was our opportunity to bring outward-facing progressive architecture to the neighborhood. But we still wanted it to be very contextual to the West Village character." SEE RESOURCES
